UTAH FOSTER CARE Symposium

Paths to Connection; Embracing Resilience, and Amplifying Adoptee Perspectives

SIBLING CONNECTIONS

By Heidi Naylor, Director, Retention Services, UFC

It is estimated that 85% of youth who enter into the Foster Care system do so with at least one sibling. The longer they remain in care, the more likely they will be separated. Maintaining family bonds makes them more resilient. It becomes a protective factor for their mental health.

Our son came to us at 11. He had been on the Adoption Exchange twice. That is where we first discovered him. He had been in foster care since he was 4 ½. We were his fourth adoptive placement. By the time he had made it to our home, he couldn't remember how many moves he had made. He lost something with each of those moves. He began to view everything as temporary, including family. When he first came into care, his oldest half-sister went with her birth father. He and his two remaining siblings entered the Christmas Box house. Family came and claimed his remaining sister. Leaving him and his brother to enter Foster Care. They moved and moved and moved together. Until it became clear that the trauma bond they shared was making it nearly impossible for either of them to heal. The hard decision was made to place them separately.

When we appeared, we knew he had three older siblings. However, we had no information where any of them were placed. Even after reviewing his file, we knew little. Siblings are the one set of people that you expect will always be with you. You will know them longer and better than anyone in your life. Although our son had siblings in our home, he mourned the loss of those who had been through so much with him. The ones that looked like him. The ones that shared his blood. We actively tried to find them. When my sister called, she mentioned that a girl lived six houses away from her. She said the girl was adopted and that she was positive that she was related to our son. We were unsure, as we had been told that both his sisters were with family. We sent her on a mission to discover more about the situation and get back to us.

A few days went by when she called again and asked us if we would call and talk to her adoptive Mom. I quickly called her. After only a few minutes on the phone, I realized we had indeed found his sister. She had entered foster care herself a few years earlier and had been moved from Salt Lake to less than 10 minutes away from us in Utah County.

We discovered finding our son had become a mission for his sister. No one knew where he was. We arranged for them to be surprised after school that day. All we told him was that we had an amazing surprise for him. We knocked on the door, and his sister opened it. There was no question she was his sister; they looked so much alike. They immediately embraced and began to cry. My son was shaking. He kept looking back at me, asking how. He knew we had tried everything we could think of. This was left in someone else's hands, and the pieces had fallen into place. To call this a miracle is almost minimizing how amazing it was that these siblings found their way back to one another. They sat for over a couple of hours sharing pictures and stories, vacillating from crying to laughing. They were almost too scared to end the visit if they lost each other again. Even more impressive is that his sister knew where the other two siblings were. We left that night with all his siblings' names, phone numbers, and addresses. And, of course, the promise of another visit. This was amazingly healing for our son. But it also turned into more children for us to love. His brother spent at least one weekend a month with us. He was able to attend both of his sister's weddings. He connected with his birth family, like his favorite Grandpa Herman, whom he missed dearly and was only with us for a few more years. A large part of him was healed by connecting with his family again. Siblings deserve the opportunity to be together or, at the very least, have contact if it is healthy and they cannot live together.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO BE A MENTOR?

By Michelle Ostmark, Mentoring Specialist

A mentor is defined as “a trusted counselor or guide.” People we trust and can talk to when things are tough, sad, and confusing and those we want to share our accomplishments and joy with. It is the opportunity to make an impact on someone’s life.

Thinking back, who are the people who have impacted and influenced you the most in your life? Are they teachers, friends, parents, colleagues, or even your children? Think back to those who helped you in your past and those who help you currently; these people continue to show up even after the dust has settled.

These people continue to show up because they care; they want to teach and encourage us while offering support, love, and understanding. They are mentors.

Foster, adoptive, and kinship families have a unique role in the life of a child in care; just like their primary family, you are irreplaceable because of the work, sacrifice, and love you give to the children and families you serve.

Mentors are foster families who choose their role and the time they dedicate to helping other families starting the foster care journey or seasoned foster families needing additional support for a hard case. Mentors decide to help guide and support foster families beginning this journey by assisting them in navigating the entire system, listening, offering support and resources, and often becoming trusted friends, using their experience and ongoing training.

Becoming a foster parent takes a great deal of consideration, preparation, and patience when faced with uncertainty and multiple changes to a family when a child in care enters a home through foster care. Families willing to open their hearts and homes to a child in care will need support once they receive that initial call for placement.

While we started this journey for many reasons, we go into it for the same reason: to make a difference in a child’s life. Our best teacher is someone who can relate to our situation and is also bound to the same confidentiality we are. You can talk to a mentor about your case and the children in your home, knowing they will maintain the same confidentiality for your family, children in care, and the primary family. Mentorship is necessary to empower foster families through support, resources, connection, and advocacy to improve the lives of the children placed in our homes through foster care.

New families are encouraged to participate in the mentoring program. The Mentoring Program is also available for families with multiple placements who need support. You can learn more at www.utahfostercare.org/mentors or contact Michelle at Utah Foster Care by calling 1-877-505-5437 or by email michelle.ostmark@utahfostercare.org.

Achieving an Optimistic Mindset

By Tina Porter, Retention Services, UFC

We are a couple of months into 2024. Maybe you started the year with renewed enthusiasm about how you would like to transform your life going forward. Maybe things have leveled off a bit, and you are ready to have a reset on channeling your positivity.

Dr. Yaldia Safia has suggestions to help you connect to your optimistic mindset:

- Focus on the positive: Start with an optimistic outlook. Recognize and review the things that you have already achieved.
- No negative self-talk: Set aspirations. It is an important skill not to allow yourself to be critical of yourself.
- Create small, actionable steps: Don't try to do too much too fast. Set attainable goals.
- Be specific with goals: Pick small, specific goals you feel good about accomplishing.
- Goals should be enjoyable: Focus on aspirations, goals, and intentions.
- Schedule check-ins with yourself: Have a plan to keep the momentum going. Modify as you see fit.
- Don't feel discouraged: Don't beat yourself up when faced with a setback. Those who succeed persevere when faced with hardships and keep trying. Remind yourself of the "why" you are setting this goal, and use it as fuel to drive you forward.

SO MUCH TO BE THANKFUL FOR

By Tina Porter, Retention Services, UFC

Utah Foster Care would like to thank everyone who made the Giving Tree Program and Santa Brigade possible. So many kind and generous people wanted to help kids in care and graciously made their holiday wishes come true by providing them with the gifts they requested. We would like to thank Giving Tree donors Canopy, Cakes 4 Kids, The Guidrys, Lisa Moore and friends, Rick Scardina and TD Williamson, Wasatch Presbyterian Church, and Wilson Sonsini for sponsoring Giving Trees. There are also many ways that the community can show their support for families caring for children. Christmas time is a shining example of people wanting to give what they can to help others.

The Airmen from Hill Air Force Base support our families by volunteering their personal resources to deliver gifts to your homes and giving the utmost attention to seeing that your gifts are brought to you with expert precision.

The incomparable Hillstead family pours their whole hearts into bringing joy into the lives of children.

Move Forward by Giving Back works tirelessly to provide the additional items that go along with the Giving Tree requests, such as pajamas, books, warm clothes, and socks.

The Murdock Auto Team provided kids in care with high-quality snow boots again this year.

There were a couple of opportunities for families to enjoy a night out together at a Jazz game in December, where they could sit courtside and watch them warm up and pose for photos with the Jazz Bear.

The Mentoring Program provides a valuable service to foster families by pairing them with a veteran foster parent who can help guide and support them through their experience.

Utah Foster Care, in partnership with First Lady Abby Cox, is building a new Care Community meant to allow people to support foster families across the state and lift those caring for Utah's children in foster care.

The Parents Night Out and volunteer program have gone from conception to fully functional.

Much innovative progress is being made to bolster foster families alongside community members who want to partner in this endeavor. I look forward to finding new ways to support our foster families in shouldering some of the weight of the day-to-day demands, recognizing that some days are noticeably more demanding than others.

UTAH FOSTER CARE IN THE NEWS!

CARE COMMUNITIES PILOT PROGRAM SEEKS TO SUPPORT FOSTER FAMILIES ACROSS THE STATE

BY Michael Camit, KSLNewsRadio

Editor's Note: Care Communities will be launched statewide in the coming months. Details will be forthcoming.

SALT LAKE CITY — Foster parents in Utah can take advantage of a new pilot program called Care Communities. The program aims to give people the chance to support foster families in the state.

The Care Communities program was first introduced into the state by Utah's First Lady, Abby Cox.

Program Director Tami Carson said foster parents face many challenges, but they don't need to face them alone.

According to Utah Foster Care, 40% of foster parents don't continue fostering past the first year. Providing more support to foster parents is one way to curb the high dropout rate.

"The children coming into foster care, the goal is for them to go home to their family, their biological or primary family. And foster parents have to do a lot of extra work to make sure that happens. So this program is an opportunity for religious communities, faith communities, nonprofits or businesses or other social groups to work with us and we give them training and then ongoing support and mentoring," said Carson.

HOW DO CARE COMMUNITIES WORK?

Care Communities are groups that build a team to figure out the best way to serve foster parents. Carson said that most people don't know just how difficult that parenting role is.

The demands in your time are higher than traditional parenting ... You're going to relearn a lot about what parenting looks like. Those demands and time really revolve around what the best outcome [is] for these children in the home," said Carson.

Additionally, the care teams offer emotional help to foster parents. Carson shared that one infertile couple came to see how their sacrifices not only helped the children they were raising but their biological parents as well.

"Their hearts completely transformed from a couple who was here because of infertility and now was really here for these kids. And they were willing to do the work over that last year and a half. We will work as hard as possible to help the parents of these children overcome these challenges. All that time providing a loving and stable home for the children that they're caring for," Carson said.

To participate in the program, Utahns can visit the Utah Foster Care website. If you don't want to be a member of a care team, Carson said you can volunteer to help in other ways.

"Those of us who can't do that right now, we can't be foster parents right now or maybe ever, but we can be friends with and learn how to be a very intentional friend for foster families and support the parents and that hard work they're doing," said Carson.

The state estimates there are more than 2,600 children currently in foster care in Utah.

NEW YEAR RESOLUTIONS

By Adriana Gardiner: Adriana Gardiner served as UFC's foster-adoptive consultant and retention specialist in the Uintah Basin. She currently lives out of state and continues to serve foster families.

As the New Year starts, we often think of new resolutions and goals to tackle over the next 365 days - whether it is spending money more frugally, losing weight, or living healthier, foster parents have a fantastic opportunity to influence others and to make a difference in the next generation and beyond. This year, keep your resolutions meaningful. Connectedness, self-care, advocacy, and inner growth are great goals to focus on as you navigate 2024.

Make a Lasting Bond

Invest time in activities that strengthen relationships between you and your children. Game nights and other family activities that include all members are a great way to spend free time. Take a minute to compliment the children for something they have done right or acknowledge a quality in them. A few minutes spent asking about their day and actively listening to their answers go a long way. Small things add up to a lot for these children.

Take Care of Yourself

Take time for yourself, your marriage, your friendships, and your birth/adoptive children. Foster parenting is stressful and often thankless. Taking care of yourself and your family will help to prevent burnout, and children learn to take time for self-care when they see you do it; this will be a lesson that will benefit them for the rest of their lives.

Self-Improvement

Make time for self-improvement—maybe a college class or learning to do something you have always wanted but did not. Take time to read, exercise, listen to music, or walk. Children learn by example, and your enthusiasm for learning will be contagious.

Advocate

You are the number one advocate for children in placement. You are the person who spends most of your time with them and knows them the best. Advocate for them. Be their voice with their case managers, therapists, school personnel, GAL, etc. Consider writing a letter with their progress report for the people involved in their case.

Network

Take some time to network with fellow foster parents. Only other foster parents know firsthand about the complex issues of fostering children. It is a rough road, full of happiness and heartache. Seasoned foster parents can support you in traveling the road ahead and look for new foster parents to Mentor and listen to. Also, be on the lookout for new potential foster parents; you have the insight into what it takes to become a resource family and can be instrumental in finding new families for foster children.

Keep up the good job

Being a parent is hard. Being a foster parent is harder. You are already doing it. Keep on loving and fighting for these children.

HELP THEM KNOW THEIR STORY

by Utah Foster Care Staff

Every February since its inception, Black History Month has been a way to honor the contributions and legacy of Black leaders, both past and present. It is a time to reflect on the impact and change Black people have made on the world, including the world of foster care.

In 1976, President Ford recognized Black History Month and urged people to “seize the opportunity to honor the too-often neglected accomplishments of Black Americans in every area of endeavor throughout our history.”

Over-Represented in Utah

Blacks make up only about 1% of our population, but Black children in foster care make up about 8%. These children are over-represented in our foster care system, and when they leave their homes, they're at risk of losing more than their families. They may also lose their identity and a sense of belonging to their community. In the last couple of years, we have seen the challenges and impact all children can face with the loss of connection and belonging, and this is especially true of all children in foster care.

Seize the Opportunity

This Black History Month, let's “seize the opportunity” to help a child in foster care know their story and empower them to know who they truly are. You can do this by asking them about their cultural and ethnic identity and prioritizing embracing who they are.

Several studies have shown that children who have a strong and positive cultural identity have greater self-esteem, higher education levels, improved coping skills, psychological adjustment, and decreased levels of loneliness and depression.

UFC limited funds available to meet special needs of children in care when DCFS is unable to.
